"And like its West Indian double, Timor has been a center of turbalence! For hearly two centuries the Portuguese and Dutch fought at frequent intervals back and forth across the imaginary line that separate their territory. In 1958 the line was fixed definitely and the fresty as since amended has relieved friction. It is provided that any subsequent disputes shall be settled by arbitration.

"An examination of a map brings out strikingly what a small fraction Timor is of the vast land area of the East Indies, once entirely under Portuguese dominion. But the island is not so small as it at first appears to be. With the huge bulk of Australia a short distance to the south, and three of the largest islands in the world grouped about it to the north, east and west, Timor seems an insignificant speck. Its area, however, is 12,450 sq. speck. Its area, however, is 12,450 sq. miles—almost four times as great as that of Porto Rice and about equal to that of Massachusetts and Connecticut together. The Portuguese territory alone has twice the area of Porto

"Neither the Portuguese nor the Dutch portions of Timor have been developed to any considerable extent though both of the nations have been represented on the island for more than represented on the island for more than 300 years. This is in large part due to the fact that Timor is relatively poor in natural resources. The island is the victim of its proximity to Australia. For many months each year hot, dry winds from the Australian deserts blow over Timor parching it svegetation and drying up its streams. The only patches of forests to be found on the southern shores of the islands are in protected valleys. The northern half has a moister climate and a heavier growth of vegetation.

"Portuguese Timor has an area of 7.330 sq. miles and an estimated population of nearly 409,000. Except for the port and capital of Dilli, a place of

The The bricks are lifted out of the machine at the rate of 22 or 23 per minute and then taken away by bogies, each carrying bricks. The bogies are then run into steaming tunnels, where he bricks are finished. This is the first time an attempt has been made to utilize any of the great mounds of waste which disfigure certain areas in Lothians. The bricks which are now being made are, it is claimed, superbeing made are, it is claimed, super-ior to those made of clay by the old crocess, and can be manufactured more
